Quotation from Wells' "Marriage".

"His thoughts were full of ideas about education: he was obsessed, as are most intelligent young parents of the modern type, by the enormous possibilities of human improvement that might be achieved - if only one could begin with the baby from the outset, on the best lines, with the best methods, training and preparing it - presumably for a cleaned and chastened world. Indeed, he made all the usual discoveries of intelligent modern young parents very rapidly, fully and completely, and overlooked most of those practical difficulties that finally reduce them to human dimensions again in quite the normal fashion.

"I sit and muse sometimes when I ought to be computing," he said. "Old Durgan watches me and grunts. But think, if we take reasonable care, watch its phases, stand ready with a kindergarten toy directly it stretches out its hand - think what we can make of it!" . . .

"We will make it the most wonderful child in the world," said Marjorie. "Indeed, what else can it be?"

"Your eyes," said Trafford, "and my hands."

"A girl."

"A boy."
